

I am writing to oppose any action on the part of the FCC to implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. The Telephone Privacy law has vastly improved the quality of life in our home. We used to average one telemarketing call a night sometimes outside of approved legal calling hours. Now we get one or two calls a month and those are generally from charities. I used to cringe every time the phone rang because I knew it would be someone calling to try and sell me something. Asking to be placed on a companies' "Do not call" list was ineffective. Now after a year on the Indiana Do Not Call list, we don't mind answering the phone so much because we know that chances are good that it is someone we want to talk to on the other end. The FCC should look to protect Indiana's Telephone Privacy law, not preempt the choice that has been made by individual citizens to protect their time at home with family.
